Jimmy Valentine, a subtle cat villain, often plays the "good Samaritan". One day he dons the guise of a beggar with a sign reading "I am blind". After a passerby gives him a penny, he resumes his own character and hands the penny to a needy mother cat. A dog policeman watches him and comes stealthily across the street. Jimmy notices him and walks to a hydrant, behind which he hides. He comes out garbed as a gentleman but his disguise does not baffle the cop who quickens his pace. Scenting trouble, Jimmy doubles on his tracks and hides behind the hydrant again. It moves down the street. Jimmy is not visible. The hydrant stands still and out walks Jimmy undisguised. The cop gives chase again. Jimmy takes refuge in an ash can, pulling the cover over himself. This eludes his pursuer for a few moments and Jimmy peeks into a large mouse hole where he sees the mouse family eating. Thoughts of a big feast excite Jimmy. When the cop approaches again, the lid comes down in position and the can walks away. After a chase the cop catches up with the can but finds no sign of Jimmy. Soon the lid scampers off with the cop in pursuit. It stops over a manhole. When the cop follows, Jimmy comes out of another manhole and the chase continues. Finally, Jimmy takes refuge in his garret home and dons another disguise. He ventures out again and lingers at the large mouse hole again to view the mouse family which he considers good "eats". Mr. Mouse sees him and detects the cat beneath the disguise. He goes out upon the roof ledge and drops a brick. It misses Jimmy but a second brick stuns him. When the cop sees him, he runs up and drags the villain away.

From this story we learn that - "A villain may disguise himself but he will never fool the wise".
